

3RD EDITION

HISTORICAL AND CONCEPTUAL ISSUES IN PSYCHOLOGY

MARC BRYSSBAERT
KATHY RASTLE

Historical and Conceptual Issues in Psychology

Conceptual and Historical Issues in Psychology

Table of Contents

Front Cover

Half Title Page

Title Page

Copyright Page

Brief Contents

Contents

Preface

Guided tour

1 The wider picture Where did it all start?

Chapter overview

1.1 The invention of writing

1.2 The discovery of numbers

1.3 The Fertile Crescent

1.4 The Greeks

1.5 Developments from the Roman Empire to the end of the Middle Ages

1.6 Turning the tide in the West

1.7 Focus on: The limits of history writing

Recommended literature

References

Notes

2 The scientific revolution of the seventeenth century and its aftermath

Table of Contents

Chapter overview

2.1 From a geocentric to a heliocentric model of the universe

2.2 Mechanisation of the world view

2.3 The formulation of the first laws of physics

2.4 What set off the scientific revolution in seventeenth-century Europe?

2.5 The new method of the natural philosopher

2.6 Changes in society as a result of the scientific revolution

2.7 Focus on: How revolutionary was the scientific revolution?

Recommended literature

References

Notes

3 Eighteenth- and nineteenth-century precursors to a scientific psychology

Chapter overview

3.1 Individualisation in Western society

3.2 Philosophical studies of the mind

3.3 Textbooks of psychology

3.4 Scientific studies of 'psychological' functions

3.5 Evolutionary theory

3.6 The contribution of statistics

3.7 Focus on: The status of medicine in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries

Recommended literature

References

Notes

4 Establishing psychology as an independent academic discipline

Chapter overview

4.1 The foundation of the first laboratory of experimental psychology in Germany

Table of Contents

4.2 Starting psychology in America: James and Titchener

4.3 Psychology in France: Ribot, Charcot, Binet

4.4 Freud and psychoanalysis

4.5 Starting psychology in the UK: finding a place between clerics, philosophers and biologists

4.6 Focus on : What about the five schools of psychology?

Recommended literature

References

Notes

5 Strengthening the scientific standing of psychology Behaviourism and cognitive psychology

Chapter overview

5.1 The perception of psychology in the USA at the beginning of the twentieth century

5.2 Making a science of behaviour

5.3 Adding cognitions to behaviour

5.4 Focus on : Has behaviourism been replaced by cognitive psychology just like behaviourism defeated structuralism and functionalism?

Recommended literature

References

6 The input from brain research

Chapter overview

6.1 Ideas in Ancient Egypt and Ancient Greece

6.2 Further insights into the anatomy and functioning of the nervous system in the Renaissance and the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries

6.3 The breakthroughs of the nineteenth century

6.4 The emergence of neuropsychology in the twentieth century

6.5 Brain imaging and the turn to neuroscience

6.6 Focus on : Can delusions be investigated with the cognitive

Table of Contents

neuropsychological approach?

Recommended literature

References

7 The mindbrain problem, free will and consciousness

Chapter overview

7.1 Dualism: the mind is independent of the brain

7.2 Materialism: the mind is the brain

7.3 Operational computers: the new eye-opener leading to functionalism

7.4 Consciousness

7.5 Focus on: How to assess consciousness in comatose patients?

Recommended literature

References

Notes

8 How did psychology affect everyday life? The history of applied psychology

Chapter overview

8.1 Changes in the treatment of mental health problems

8.2 Psychological testing

8.3 The psychology of work and organisation

8.4 Focus on: The lure of idealising classic studies

Recommended literature

References

9 What is science?

Chapter overview

9.1 Thoughts about information acquisition from Ancient Greece to the end of the nineteenth century

9.2 The first twentieth-century attempt at demarcation: observation, induction and verification

9.3 The second twentieth-century attempt at demarcation: falsification

Table of Contents

9.4 Science is a succession of paradigms

9.5 The pragmatic alternative

9.6 Focus on : How to respond to scientific findings?

Recommended literature

References

Notes

10 Is psychology a science?

Chapter overview

10.1 Reasons why psychology is claimed to be a science

10.2 Reasons why psychology is not seen as a science

10.3 The critique of scientific psychology

10.4 Focus on: Can the history of psychology be taught by psychologists?

Recommended literature

References

Notes

11 Psychology and open science Twenty-first-century developments

Chapter overview

11.1 Replication crisis

11.2 Call for open science

11.3 An evolving publication culture

11.4 Focus on: Is scientific progress slowing down?

Recommended literature

References

12 The contribution of quantitative and qualitative research methods

Chapter overview

12.1 The essence of quantitative research

Table of Contents

12.2 The essence of qualitative research

12.3 How do quantitative and qualitative research methods relate to each other?

12.4 Focus on: Is too much respect for the philosophy of science bad for morale?

Recommended literature

References

13 The precarious balance between biological, psychological and social influences

Chapter overview

13.1 What drives people? McDougall and his critics

13.2 The biological perspective

13.3 The psychological perspective

13.4 The socio-cultural perspective

13.5 Focus on: Why are people aggressive?

Recommended literature

References

Note

14 Psychology and society The socio-political side

Chapter overview

14.1 Ways in which society has influenced psychology

14.2 Ways in which psychology has influenced society

14.3 Focus on: To what extent have psychologists been able to change the negative image of mental disorders?

Recommended literature

References

Epilogue

Glossary

Table of Contents

Bibliography

Publisher's acknowledgements

Index

Back Cover